The other day I was observing my British Bulldog "Ellen" and I found she was sitting down on the bench beside me (she normally sits on her bed). I was surprised that she was not moving but as I was thinking about it she was looking at something on my laptop screen, probably me. This morning I took her for a walk around the garden and I asked her to do the same, she just sat on the same bench, not moving, looking at me...I'm sure she has never done this before. I don't know why, it's as if her intelligence has been triggered, she's thinking "there's another human being here, look!". I even tried to tempt her by walking away to find her following me! It was like she had been the watchdog for my family and someone had called her into action for the first time. This morning I watched her and she sat and watched me for about 5 minutes, this time I sat with my laptop on the bench so it was easy for her to see me. I'm not sure if this has anything to do with either of you but it makes me wonder, does anybody know what she was doing while I was at work? I agree with the other posters. Your dog can't actually "see" you from where she is sitting. However, she can probably sense you at a distance. Look at your pup! Is she really so relaxed that she can just sit there? I have seen the behavior before, in a calmer setting. A big Lab kept coming up to our front door and sitting next to me. I did not know he was there until I was looking at something I was reading and he moved closer to me, his big head was in the reading light. I told him to get away and he did, even though I knew he wouldn't run away because he loves me. I have seen him sit and wait for long periods. My guess would be that your pooch was sitting there as a sign of alertness, to watch you as you go to work or wherever. When you came back, she stayed there 82157476af
